The Corner Office: Sarah Levey, Co-Founder of Y7 Studio

When Sarah Levey decided to develop a Hip-Hop Yoga studio, the idea initially received skepticism. Her idea evolved into Y7, a studio that combines traditional yoga practices with the non-traditional elements of Hip-Hop creating a hybrid capable of breaking down the barriers between two diametrically opposed cultures.

Some of the most successful people in the game refused to follow the rules to make it happen, they did it their own way. Welcome to the Corner Office.

Although it's a culture fueled by emotion and movement, Hip-Hop has historically been hesitant to explore issues of health and wellness. When Sarah Levey decided to develop a Hip-Hop Yoga studio, the idea initially received skepticism. Hip-Hop on its face may seem like the antithesis of yoga but Sarah saw the connections, not the conflicts. They are both cultures of inclusion driven by a strong sense of community. Her idea evolved into Y7, a studio that combines traditional yoga practices with the non-traditional elements of Hip-Hop creating a hybrid capable of breaking down the barriers between two diametrically opposed cultures.

Known for their black and white color scheme, modern design and minimal aesthetic, Y7 is rooted in balance and simplicity. Each studio is designed to create a comforting environment where clients can take a break from daily

From the idea behind Y7 to the experience you've created – What makes Hip-Hop and Yoga work so well together?

Sarah Levey: For me, it's all about movement. I have always been drawn to Hip-Hop – from the beat, to the liveliness of the culture and the community. So, it's been really amazing to practice this ancient tradition of yoga and blend it with something more contemporary and engaging to our generation.
